Overall a very good story and I must congratulate the narrator who made the characters come alive. If I had any criticism it would be that considering there was so much detail on a particular scene in earlier chapters, I would have liked a little more detail and "action" when the ragged heiress claims her inheritance back.

On September 16th, 1843, Charles Dickens wrote a letter to Angela Burdett-Coutts in Broadstairs, Kent. He opens the letter by remarking on his current progress writing Martin Chuzzlewit (which he would publish in monthly installments from January 1843 — July 1844). But the majority of the letter meditates on the condition of a particular Ragged school in London, probably the Field Lane Ragged ...
